Out-door Life His Theme

The dean of American sportsmen and writers, Charles Hallock, passes the better part of each year quietly in Washington. He is now at Plainfield, Mass., however, where he has summer quarters, and will stay there probably until the end of October. Mr. Hallock is seventy-three years old and still writes readily and entertainingly. A high tribute was paid him in a recent issue of the Sportsman's Review by Levant Fred Brown, who reviewed his career and told of his notable achievements as a traveler and a writer. He wrote a remarkable series of articles during the period between 1857 and 1870—"Red River Trail," "Life Among American Loggers," "Three Months in Labrador," "Restigouche River," "Sable Island," "Aroostook and the Madawaska," and other articles pertaining to outdoor life. Editors clamored for his work, and no other writer on such topics has so large a circle of readers. London Field praised Hallock as "a thorough and accomplished sportsman, warm worshiper of nature, keen eye for the picturesque, quaint methods of expression; gentleman as well as sportsman; fishing feats to make the mouth water, but no exaggeration or boasting. We must look to our British angling laurels," it added, "when a man like Charles Hallock comes to the front."

Mr. Brown, in his tribute, says: "A man's real greatness is measured best by the number of hearts which hold him dear. The best test of an author is the special delight and honor which he creates in his readers. To mention these tributes to an American sportsman is to spell the name of Charles Hallock." He also says he has seen Hallock "guest of honor at a great banquet in New York, where two hundred sportsmen from over half British America and the states, and even from England, had gathered to honor him. He blushed with modest embarrassment." A thriving town which is the county seat of the extreme northwest region of Minnesota is named after him. He is now, as he expresses it, "nursing a bare little remnant of life," and lives largely in his past and its memories.—Washington Herald.

Investigation

"I suppose you have been devoting some time to public questions during the holidays."

"Yes," answered Senator Sorghum; "public questions have their place, although I don't always find them as important as private inquiries."—Washington Star.
